ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

In writing this thesis, I am made aware of many friends and colleagues who have helped make this project possible. First of all, I would like to thank Buanguen Nongduan, “Mae Laa” for being our adoptive mother, language teacher, and constant encourager. Her willingness to share the treasures of her fascinating life with us will always be appreciated.

This thesis could not have been written without the instruction and encouragement of my thesis advisor, Dr. Frances Woods. She has shed much light on the interplay of cultural and discourse studies and encouraged me greatly in this endeavor. I am also indebted to the other members of my committee, Dr. Rattaporn Sethakul and William J. Hanna, who gave of their time to proofread and comment on my thesis. I wish to thank Dr. Ken Gregerson and Dr. Sigrid Wichmann for valuable comments as well. Furthermore, I owe much gratitude to Noi Thong Wonglua and A. Petchara Meesuk for performing the painstaking task of transcribing Mae Laa’s recorded stories.

I thank my family for their unfailing encouragement, particularly my father and mother, Justice and Mary Ann Anderson, who have taught me the great significance of cross-cultural studies and communication. I also wish to thank Roger and Bonnie Person for the encouraging words and letters along the way.

Above all these I am grateful to and for my husband, Kirk Person, who has been an unconditional source of motivation, support, love, and joy throughout the entire thesis process. Thank you for everything, dear one.
